The closest like-for-like alternative is the Morphy Richards 3.5L Sear and Stew Slow Cooker. At £38.99, it's slightly more expensive than the Crockpot, but it matches the same 3.5-litre size, making it ideal for 3-4 people. The big win here is the sear-and-stew design: you can brown meat in the hob-proof pot before slow cooking, which means richer flavour and fewer pans. It also has dishwasher-safe non-stick aluminium and cool-touch handles, which is handy in a busy UK kitchen. What it lacks is the programmable countdown timer, so if you like setting dinner off in the morning and knowing exactly when it's done, the Crockpot still has the edge. Choose this if you want better flavour-building and easy cleaning.

If you want more capacity, the Morphy Richards 6.5L Easy Time Slow Cooker is a smart upgrade. For £58, it's a proper family-size option that's better for batch cooking, Sunday roasts, chilli, curry, or feeding 5+ people. It also has automatic heat settings, keep warm mode, and a countdown indicator, so it feels more premium and practical for longer cooks. The downside is obvious: it takes up more worktop space, uses a bigger pot, and is overkill if you're just cooking for a couple or a small household. This is the one to pick if you regularly cook large portions or want freezer-friendly leftovers.

The Crockpot Lift and Serve Digital Slow Cooker 4.7L is the most natural brand alternative. At £65, it costs more than the 3.5L model, but you get a larger bowl and a hinged lid, which is useful if you're serving straight from the pot at the table. It still gives you the programmable countdown timer and the familiar Crockpot experience, so it's a good step up if you like the original but need a bit more space. What's worse is the higher price and larger footprint. It's best for households that love casseroles, pulled pork, or curries and want a neater serving setup.

The Yum Asia Sakura Rice Cooker is not a direct slow cooker replacement, but it is a brilliant alternative if your real goal is easy, hands-off meal prep. At £139.90, it's much more expensive, but it offers fuzzy logic cooking, a ceramic bowl, and multiple rice and multicook functions. It's excellent for rice, grains, porridge, and some one-pot dishes, but it won't replace a traditional slow cooker for stews, shredded meats, or classic low-and-slow recipes. Choose this if you cook lots of rice-based meals and want a premium appliance with a UK/EU 220-240V plug setup.

Finally, the Ooni Fyra 12 is for people who've realised they don't actually want a slow cooker at all — they want a showstopper outdoor cooker. At £299, it's the priciest option here by a mile, and it's not for indoor worktops or everyday stews. But if you love entertaining, outdoor cooking, and proper wood-fired pizza, it's hard to beat for flavour and fun. It's portable, compact for a pizza oven, and hugely impressive in a garden setup. Pick this only if you're moving away from slow cooking and into outdoor pizza nights.

Overall, the best alternative for most buyers is the Morphy Richards 3.5L Sear and Stew if you want a similar size and better cooking versatility. If you need more room, the 6.5L Morphy Richards or the 4.7L Crockpot are the smarter upgrades.

Still Buy the Original If...

Buy the original if you want a compact 3.5L slow cooker with a programmable countdown timer, easy UK plug compatibility, and a straightforward set-and-forget setup for 3-4 people. It's the best fit for small households that value convenience over extra features.
